It m plain to see that there has been a marked declension, if not a revolution, in Christianity, since the days of its simplicity of faith and practice. In the Christian Church, A. 1D. 1880, to denounce Usary would be at once to make an attack upon religion, morality and society, as these new exist. Usary lies at the base of modern civilization, hence to overthrow the east seems to subvert the other. But we need not apprehend, in this country, any violent assault upon property, yet it is olvidous, from the "signs of the times," that a propess of social and moral Evolution, rather than in the surface and moral Evolution, rather than in depth. The water in the brewary wells had now become impure on account of having drawn the surface water down to the browary wells had not been surface at that point. The education of the masses, the diffusion of Truth by means of the printing press, and especially the irresistible truths of theology and sociology comprehended simply in the command enjoining the love of God and the brotherhood of manking, are the great forces which are even now erecting that Church and that Civilization foreshadowed in Dan. ii: 44-45.

A historian, uriting of the sactive Church, says: 'She softened the rigors of Pagan slavery, and finally overthrew it entirely.'' The bleating of the shorn sheep, the cry that has lately come across the ocean from Ireland, is doing much to arouse indignation against the Christian shearers of England, but it is characteristic that while Beecher and Talmage have both come out bravely and strongly in behalf of suffering Ireland and against English misrule, neither, for obvious reasons, has dared to attack, specifically,
